Four Years Ago To-Morrow we first opened the doors of our present big store, and our instantaneous success was the talk of the town. This success was not temporary, but has continued from year to year, until the volume of trade has more than quadrupled, and the immense building is already too small for our growing needs.

It is not our intention to boast of the past, however, though we have abundant reasons for so doing, but rather to turn towards the future with the determination to excel all that has preceded and to continue to be, as heretofore, "The Fastest Growing Store in America."

With that end in view and to show our appreciation of the public's splendid patronage, we submit these unexampled bargains for Monday—Greater Grand-Leader's 4th Birthday.

The Fastest Growing Store in America.

LABOR LEADERS PASS FROM PUBLIC VIEW.

The Republic Bureau, 14th St. and Pennsylvania Ave., Washington, Sept. 7.—The great steel strike gives interest to a short review of strike leaders of the past, their success or failure, and their fate.

To one familiar with strikes President Hauser serves to bring to mind other labor leaders prominent in their time, who have gone before him and who have disappeared, more or less, from public view.

Some of them are dead. Others managed to get some political position, still others have either accepted positions from the manufacturers they opposed or, blackballed, as they claim to have been, are eking out existence in other walks of life.

Of all the leaders of great strikes or labor organizations and movements, there are today but three men who, holding the confidence of the men they lead, are still at the helm. Each one has been known for his conservatism. They are: Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor; President Arthur of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and John Mitchell, who led the miners in their recent struggle. All these believe in arbitration, and have always used all means at their disposal to avoid strife.

A few years ago the name of James Boyce was prominent in labor circles. He was the general master workman of the Knights of Labor. It was said of him that he could, in the event of a labor war, call out on strike a million men. Sovereign was his name in the labor world, and he was a general public figure. He is now employed by an insurance company in the South.

Eugene V. Debs, who at one time was hailed as labor's Moses, is no longer conspicuous. His voice is heard now and then through the paper with which he is connected, the White Slave, but so far as the general public is concerned his name is rarely heard. There was a time when men wanted to nominate him as an independent candidate for President of the United States. The American Railway Union, of which he was president, is also a thing of the past.

There is scarcely a labor union man in the country who has not known of P. J. McGuire, who for years was secretary-treasurer of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and first vice president of the American Federation of Labor. He was one of the principal organizers of the latter body, and was afterward known throughout the organization as its real head. He is no longer an officer of the Federation, and has no influence in labor circles.

Martin Irons, whose work in the great strike of a decade or so ago is still talked of in labor circles, is dead. Not a friend of Irons when he passed away in Texas, and none of his former associates knew he was ill or was aware of his whereabouts. He sought that State, it is claimed, because of his bitterness toward the union labor men who when he failed had reviled him.

Thomas V. Powderly is alive today, and holds the political office of Commissioner of Immigration in the United States Treasury Department. But he is short of his power in labor circles. The strike of the great Northwestern Railroad system, which tied up all the Gould lines, was the beginning of the end, so far as he was concerned. He settled that strike after a short conference with the late Jay Gould, while the other members of the Executive Committee were seated in an ante-room. After the conference, Powderly came out and announced that the strike was settled, and the Executive Committee, which was there to argue matters, retired in disorder. The inevitable row followed, with serious results to Powderly as a labor leader. That was the entering wedge that ultimately wrecked the Knights of Labor. It fell to pieces, and now is split into two factions.

"Tom" McGuire, who led the telegraphers' strike, is now employed in the appraiser's office, and from a labor standpoint, is forgotten.

James E. Quinn, the master workman, died in poverty, after failing to win the big freight handlers' strike.

Victor Drury, who flourished locally at that time, is a farmer, living in New Jersey.

Of the other celebrities, John McLuck, who was prominent in the longshoremen's strike of 1881, is still living and holding political office in another State; Timothy Putnam Quinn is out West; "Mike" Fitzgerald is employed in a brewery; "Con" Connelly is dead, while Paul Meyer is now working in a nonunion shop. All were great strike leaders in their time, and all were Knights of Labor.

John Morrison, who led the weavers' big strike, is never heard of now, yet it is he who fought the Home Club and had their building, Pythagoras Hall, sold under the hammer. It was largely on account of his fight that the American Federation of Labor was formed. That was in 1882. Samuel Gompers was the first president, but even he was beaten for the office later on by John McBride, the miner. Then Gompers, at the next convention, won, and McBride is now holding a political office.

At least 100 others, who, if not well known all over the United States, were men in strikes and labor movements locally, are either dead, forgotten or officeholders.
